

College for Financial Planning adds 3 master's programs

InsuranceTimes™ Copyright © by M&S Communications, Inc. September 16, 2003

Insurance professionals seeking greater credibility and further career development are now able to choose from three master's degree programs at the College for Financial Planning, all offered in the a blended, instructor-led distance learning format. The masters degrees are Personal Financial Planning, Finance, and Financial Analysis.

Financial planner income has increased substantially in recent years, from an average net of $75,000 in 1998 to $120,000 in 2002, according to the 2002 Survey of Trends of Certified Financial Planner certificate holders.

John Sears, president of the College for Financial Planning said, "With these increases in income have come requests for additional programs, as professionals in insurance, banking, accounting, investments and financial counseling seek to enhance their skills and provide an even broader range of services to their clients." He added, "We expect continued strong income growth among insurance professionals who add to their expertise over the course of their careers."

For further information, email the College at ssc@fp.edu or call (800) 237-9990. □